

A Personal Injury Attorney Can Save The Day

If you have to file a claim with an insurance company you may feel like you are being fed to the wolves. In all actuality, you almost are. Insurance companies are very good at playing hardball and their first offer is always the absolute bare minimum.

Maybe you aren't even sure if you have a shot at a case. Just ask yourself if you have lost anything that can't be replaced. If you walked away unscathed then you probably don't have a case at all.

If you have been involved in an auto accident and the driver of the other car was at fault, uninsured or underinsured you should definitely consult an attorney. In some states, you only have a limited amount of time to take legal action against the uninsured driver. Some insurance policies require arbitration agreements between you and the uninsured to be reached within 60 days after the day of the accident.

In order to get what you deserve from an insurance company you must have control of all of the facts and a thorough understanding of insurance and liability law. The most important thing that you can do if you are seriously injured is to document every fragment of your injury and every part of your treatment.

Always follow up with the doctor and go to the emergency room so you have all documentation.

Personal injury lawyers know all of the ropes and how all pieces of business should be connected. Lawyers know which damages fall under which category and how each category can be specifically reimbursed. There are several different categories that are usually reimbursed.

Personal injury attorneys usually require compensatory damages. The reason for this request is to bring the client back to where they were prior to the accident. Attorneys call this as making the client "whole."

Lawyers will ask the courts for general damages. These are losses that can't be given a dollar amount. The loss of a spouse or child falls under this category.

When the defendant has been found to be guilty intentionally or through negligence, punitive fees are often requested. These are damages that go far past the actual monetary damage caused by the defendant. A lawyer who has expertise in injuries will know everything about punitive damages.
